A call for following up with someone after they attended an event or webinar - it references what they showed up for, connects it to a relevant next step, and respects that attending is not the same as buying.

Learning objectives

- Reference the specific event they attended
- Connect their attendance to a plausible interest
- Offer a next step that matches that interest
- Avoid treating attendance as a commitment

Follow up in four beats

1. Name the event and thank them for attending or registering.
2. Reference the topic or session as the reason you are calling.
3. Ask an open question about whether the topic is a live issue for them.
4. Offer a next step sized to their actual interest, not your hope.

Keep attendance in perspective

- Registering for a webinar is curiosity, not intent to buy.
- They may have attended for one narrow reason - ask, do not assume.
- A "just browsing" answer is legitimate; leave a friendly door open.

Worked example

"Hi Marco, Sam from Northlight - thanks for joining our session on scaling support last Thursday. I am reaching out to the folks who came because the coverage part tends to be a real, current headache. Is that something you are actually wrestling with right now, or were you mostly there for the hiring section? ... Got it - then the piece worth sharing is probably X. Want me to send it, or set up a short call?"

Safe-practice note

Attending an event is a small signal, not permission to hard-sell - treat it as a reason to ask, not to assume. Reference only the event they actually joined. If they were there out of general curiosity, offer something useful and let them decide the pace.
