

Voicemail That Earns a Callback

Script - Skill: opening - Difficulty: beginner - Est. 5 min

A short voicemail structure - under twenty seconds - that gives a real reason to call back without hype, false urgency, or a mystery you refuse to explain.

Learning objectives

- Leave a voicemail the prospect can act on
- State a specific, honest reason for the call
- Make the callback easy with a clear number
- Avoid pressure tactics that damage trust

Say it in this order

1. Your name and company, spoken slowly.
2. One honest sentence about why you called this person.
3. What a callback would cover, so it is not a mystery.
4. Your number, said twice and clearly, then a short thank you.

What to avoid

Tempting line	Why to drop it
"Call me back urgently."	Fake urgency reads as a trick and erodes trust.
"I have something important for you."	A withheld mystery feels manipulative, not intriguing.
"You will want to hear this."	You are deciding for them what they want.

Worked example

"Hi Jordan, this is Sam with Northlight - that is S-A-M. I called because I saw your team is hiring support reps, and weekend coverage is usually where things get tight when you scale. If it is worth a short conversation I can walk you through how two similar teams handled it - no pressure either way. My number is 555-0142, again 555-0142. Thanks Jordan."

Safe-practice note

One voicemail per attempt is plenty - stacking messages feels like pressure. Never imply a prior conversation that did not happen, and never leave a deliberately vague message designed to force a callback. If they never call back, that is an answer too.
